

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Many reviews of our earlier publication Social values and development: Asian perspectives (Sage, 1988) deplored the lack of acquaintance with Asian cultures, outlook and orientations to psychology on the part of mainstream psychologists, and emphasized the need for going "beyond the West" so far as the future development of psychology was concerned. These observations induced us to undertake the project of providing perspectives on psychology in Asia.

We were encouraged to undertake the project as a joint endeavour of the Division of Psychology and National Development of the International Association of Applied Psychology (IAAP) and the International Network of Psychology and the Developing World of the International Union of Psychological Science (IUPsyS). We appreciate the support received from them. We are also grateful to the Department of Psychology, University of Hong Kong, for the administrative and financial support throughout the project, without which periodic meetings and consultations between the editors would not have been possible.

A task of this dimension cannot be accomplished without the help and cooperation of many scholars in different parts of the world. We are beholden to them not only for readily agreeing to contribute papers but also for their patience and indulgence in revising and abridging their papers more than once.

We are deeply grateful to Vidya Thirunarayanan for the excellent photographs depicting different aesthetic moods (rasas). In the preparation of the typescript, valuable assistance was received from Emma Hill, Cindy Li, Theresa Leung, Kendy Tse and Doris Fung. We are particularly thankful to Dr. Prakash Nath Bhargava for the help rendered in the preparation of the final version of the typescript. Thanks are also due to Kamala (Manju) Jha and Harsh Jha for the preparation of the consolidated list of references, and Dr. R.C. Mishra, Dr. H.S. Asthana for the subject and author index. Without their patience and untiring assistance the completion of the book would not have been possible.
