

Acknowledgements

A big thank-you is owed to Faye Leerink in her role at Routledge for encouraging us to develop not one, but two edited works on animals and leisure (this book being partner to Domestic Animals, Humans, and Leisure, which is also edited by us). An equally big thank-you is, of course, due to all the authors who have worked on the chapters; without them there truly would be no book. The idea for both books and most of the associated chapters stemmed from a series of sessions we put together for the 2015 Australian and New Zealand Association for Leisure Studies (ANZALS) Conference. Consequently, thanks are also due to ANZALS and the conference organisers for providing the opportunity for the seed of an idea to germinate into a book (or two).

For Neil, as ever, special thanks go to his wife Sarah and children Ben, Tat and Gus. All the animals that have been part of his life (and most especially his dogs – Snuffie, Gypsy and most recently Ebony) are owed thanks for keeping him balanced and providing inspiration. It is also perhaps time to thank the National Parks authorities in Queensland, Australia for giving, unwittingly a push to look into issues surrounding animals and leisure. Without their policy of not allowing dogs in National Parks, it is likely Neil never would have wandered down this research path. Thanks are also due to Durrell (now Jersey Zoo) for helping Neil to move beyond dogs to study all animals in the leisure space. Many other zoos and National Park authorities around the world have helped in this way and Neil thanks them all.

For Janette, a thousand thanks go to Neil as a supportive mentor and colleague in my first foray into book editing. Thanks also to life and work colleagues and friends for tolerance, debriefing, conversations and chocolate as needed. So to Greg, Caroline, Richard and many others (including our authors) 'Thank-you +++'. Because of you and our lovely editorial team my first foray into book editing has been hard, but incredibly fulfilling work.

Finally, for Neil, as the Head of the Department of Tourism at the University of Otago there is the recognition that any research undertaken or works published while an HoD can only occur if the staff of the Department are hugely supportive. In this context, the work of Trudi MacLaren and Pip Lennon is hugely appreciated. Their administrative support gives me the time to be able to focus on things like this book. Thanks also go to all the academics in the Department for being so good at their jobs that they make the HoD job into one that need not consume all my time and energy.

Neil and Janette
August 2017