

"This theoretically nuanced, scientifically informed, and historically and culturally sensitive collection delves into the logics of extermination at a crucial time. As our activities create more and more refugees, both human and non-human, the rhetoric of invasion has unprecedented power that calls us to ask critical questions. The chapters in this volume, written by philosophers, geographers, environmental humanities scholars, and others, provide a necessary intervention that will help us grapple with the complexities of ecological and social harms created by the eradication of individuals and species deemed non-native."

—Lori Gruen, Wesleyan University, author of Entangled Empathy: An Alternative Ethic for Our Relationships with Other Animals

"This collection refreshingly approaches the issue of invasion ecology from the urgently needed perspectives of ethics and rhetoric. Each of these chapters questions the received idea of an 'invasive species' as a morally compromised destroyer of a privileged 'ecosystem,' a category with an inherent moral and aesthetic stamp of approval. The chapters expose the rhetorical stances of invasion, migration, and reproductive futurism across species boundaries, indicting the nativist and colonialist discourses that sustain the oppression and abuse of human and non-human animals alike. The stories we tell when we separate invaders from the ecology they supposedly invade draw on deeply ingrained discourses of nativism and colonialism. These chapters do not simply take those stories apart: each one tells new, more inclusive stories that can structure more inclusive, generous, and ethically engaged ecosystems."

—Robert Stanton, Boston College

"This volume introduces a broad set of valuable, insightful, and critical interventions into the field of 'invasion ecology' that one hopes will be engaged with by both conservation biologists and the wider policy sphere in order to provoke debate and contest current practice."

—Richard Twine, Edge Hill University

The chapters in The Ethics and Rhetoric of Invasion Ecology aim to reformulate the debate on non-native species by arguing for an alternative approach that advances the possibility of an ethics of cohabitation.
