

Preface

Almost all ecological and conservation work requires censusing, and the aim of this book is to describe the main techniques. I asked the authors of each chapter to outline those techniques which are most widely used for that taxonomic group and state the problems and advantages associated with each.

I thank the students on the Tropical Biological Association field course at Kibale Forest, Uganda and undergraduates at the University of East Anglia for testing and commenting on an earlier draft of this book.

University of East Anglia

William J. Sutherland