This book is to a considerable extent a product of the RSPB's Skylark Research Project, which ran from 1995 to 1999.¹ I'm extremely grateful to the RSPB for offering me the opportunity and resources to undertake detailed research on this wonderful bird. Andy Evans and Jerry Wilson guided and managed the project, and Dave Buckingham, Lys Muirhead, Will Kirby, Sabine Schmitt and John Middleton were involved throughout. A small army of fieldworkers, volunteers and farmers helped us in many ways during this project and I would like to thank everyone involved. However, I hope that in this book I have not given too much prominence to the RSPB project, which is just one of a large number of detailed studies carried out on this species. I have had the pleasure of discussing Skylarks with just about everyone who has researched the species during the last twenty years, and I would like to thank them all for their insights, help and encouragement. Many people were generous enough to comment on one or more chapters, for which help I would like to thank Rob Robinson, Mike Brooke, Simon Gillings, Natalino Fenech, John Hutchinson, Will Kirby, Markus Jenny, Dave Buckingham, Fiona Roberts, Gillian Gilbert, Tony Morris, Kathryn Murray and Trevor and Diana Donald.

Ian Dawson and Lynn Giddings in the RSPB library were, as always, generous and patient to a fault when it came to tracking down obscure references for me, and Ian's encyclopaedic knowledge of the literature was a huge resource that I tapped on many occasions. Tim Melling and Mark Cocker were kind enough to provide me with all sorts of arcane historical information. I am also grateful to Ian Fisher for preparing the maps, and to Gillian Gilbert for preparing the spectrograms.

I originally started writing this book in collaboration with Juliet Vickery, who unfortunately had to drop out in the early stages. I'm very grateful to Juliet for her help and support throughout.

Jevgeni Shergalin (ZooLit), Simon O'Sullivan, Sabine Schmitt, Ferdinand Rühle and Debbie Pain were kind enough to translate papers for me. For allowing me access to unpublished material and for providing additional information, I would like to thank Peter Ryan, Irene Tieleman, Ainārs Auniņš, Joe Williams, Tony Morris, Herman Arentsen, Natalino Fenech, Hilda Keane, Paul Tout, Keith Barnes, Mark Cocker, Stefan Thomsen, Sibylle Stöckli, Knut Jeromin, Colin Wells,

Richard Gregory, Piotr Tryjanowski, Francisco Suárez, Manuel Morales, Francisco Moreira, David Conlin, Giorgos Catsadorakis, Claire Papazoglou and the Lega Abolizione Caccia.

Marianne Taylor and Nigel Redman at A&C Black provided expert support throughout, and I am very grateful to Hugh Brazier for his skilful editorial improvements. Many thanks also to Alan Harris, for enlivening the text and the cover of this book with his wonderful illustrations, and to the photographers whose work adorns these pages.
