My editor, John Schline, Vice President and Corporate Director of Business Affairs at Penguin Group (USA) Inc., made many useful suggestions about this book, and was always a source of enthusiasm and support for the work I did. Our collaboration began when I brought him a group of stories; he worked solidly with me to structure and organize them to tell the precise narrative I had intended. Among his wonderful recommendations was the subject of the last chapter, which came up during a Sunday walk in New York City when I told him the story.

Special thanks are due to John Bockstoe, Lee Talbot, and David White for letting me share their stories and use their names, and to Richard Pfilf for his cheering story about Maggie's Bend. I also thank Lee for reading much of the manuscript and providing his usual helpful insights and comments. My now deceased father-in-law, Heman Chase, who taught me about old mills, New England forests and their charming people, is a voice behind all these stories through his strong influence on my life.

I am indebted to all the people whose personal accounts I have told, whose identities I have changed to protect them, for living their lives and providing the rich material that made this book possible.

Finally, I'd like to thank Diana for finding me after all these years and helping me when I needed it most.
